The composition of the colours of natural bodies of all sorts may be readily tested by looking through a prism at a stripe of.the object continuous with a stripe of white paper of the same breadth, over a perfectly black ground. The rays which the object sends to the eye will appear in their proper places in the spectrum of its stripe, whilst, therays which it does not send, or in which it is defective as compared with white, will be discovered by comparing this spectrum with the adjoining spectrum of the stripe of white paper. If the colour to be examined belongs to a translucent substance, it may be placed behind part of a slit in an opaque screen, and the light of a white sky be transmitted through it. If it belong to a pigment, a portion of a stripe of white paper may be covered with the pigment (taking care to cover well the edges, and to make the ends square) and the stripe, placed over a dark cavity, may then be viewed through the prism. The colours of flowers may be examined in like manner by laying small rectangular portions of the leaves on a stripe of white paper of the same width. Such experiments afford an admirable means of instructing the eye to judge correctly of the constitution of...
