Others are so strongly inclined to egg production that they keep on laying and yield only slowly to the molting influence. Still others appear to continue laying more or less while also shedding gradually and grow new plumage without becoming naked. A sure indication that molting has begun is found in the number of loose feathers scattered about where the flock is staying although the change in their coats is hardly apparent until it is fully completed. Finally, the neat, clean, bright plumage of most of the flock, shows that the fowls have come out in new dress and are ready for the coming winter season. MODIFIED MOLTING RATION. The proportion of Linseed meal to use in feeding the flock is well illustrated by taking a very practical daily ration for dry feeding of laying Leghorns. This ration is for one hundred...
