Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Management Education: Socialization for What? The management education research project has attempted to examine the processes and outcomes of management education. First, we have explored the content and methodology of management education at MIT in order to determine precisely its dynamics and effects. Secondly, we have focused on changes in attitudes and values during the educational experience in order to determine how the student is socialized toward the managerial role. Finally, we have examined the managerial career after graduation to explore problems of the utilization of management education. We have relied on a variety of research instruments, techniques, and populations. First, whenever possible, we have gathered longitudinal data on students, starting with their educational experience and following them into their early career years. We make the assumption that the educational institution is only one of a series of organizations which influences the individual during his emerging career. Longitudinal studies enable us to measure the changes and effects which occur during and after the educational experience, and to infer the origin of such changes. Measuring change...
