Those of the tracheal cells are shown upon p. 152. Their motion is very remarkable when watched by the microscope; they wave usually towards orifices, and all bend at once, like corn when affected by the wind, sometimes they sweep round, like the feathering of an oar. A little powdered charcoal makes their movements more apparent. They move long after muscular motion has ceased; thus, the tracheal cilia of man have been seen to wave 7 days after death, and those of the oesophagus of the turtle 19 days, when the body was becoming putrid. Ciliary motion is best preserved by a uniform degree of moisture and temperature, and continues longest in blood--whereas bile checks it at once. It appears to be independent of muscular or nervous force, as it remains so long after their departure, and even upon one separated epithelial-cell; and...
